Dr Saul WIENER, 46 Balaclava Road, St Kilda East, Vic 3183

For service to science, and to medical research through contributions to the development of the Redback spider and Stonefish antivenom, and as an allergist.

Dr Wiener undertook research at the Commonwealth Serum Laboratories (CSL) in the 1950s into the development of Redback spider and Stonefish venoms. These antivenoms are still considered, some 50 years after their development, to be mainstays of treatments for the envenoming by these creatures. It is notable that redback spider envenoming is the commonest and most important envenoming syndrome in Australia, with some 5,000 people treated each year. Dr Wiener's research on Stonefish led to the development of the world's first marine (and only fish) antivenom; importantly, his research was conducted in his 'spare time' at CSL as it was not the primary focus of his employment. Dr Wiener's early research on the venom of the Funnel Web spider venom was also important in the later development of an antivenom for these bites. He later researched the concept of active immunisation for snake bite which was published in 1960 in the American Journal of Tropical Medicine and Hygiene, and pioneered research on Cone Snail venom which is now a 'global source of novel drug discovery'.

Dr Wiener went on to continue his career in the field of allergy and immunology.
